Manager Comment

Global market sentiment was dominated in the second quarter of 2016 by the lead up to the so called "Brexit" vote in the UK and the fall-out following the outcome. As we approached voting day, positive market sentiment suggested that the UK would vote to remain a member of the European Union. Markets thus reacted quite negatively to the narrow victory to the exit camp. Days after the sell-off, markets recovered with many markets trading close to pre-Brexit levels at the beginning of July. Locally, sentiment was affected in May by concerns around the future of the finance minister while the Brexit vote in June had mixed effects on local asset classes.

While June was a negative month for equities, the first two months largely offset this as global markets generally provided small positive returns or were flat for the quarter. Developed market equities returned 0.3% while emerging markets were down 0.3%. Global bonds performed well on the back of a risk-off trade in June, returning 2.9% in USD driven mostly by government bonds. Global property performed in line with bonds, delivering 3.7% in USD. Locally, the All Share index rose 0.4% driven mostly by resources, which rose 6.4%. Financials came under pressure during the quarter, declining 1.2%, especially stocks with large UK exposures such as Old Mutual and Investec, while industrials were up marginally (0.4%). Bonds were the leading local class returning 4.4% as long-dated bonds performed well. Property declined 0.4% driven lower particularly by rand hedge property stocks such as Capital & Counties and Intu, which came under pressure following the Brexit vote. The rand was especially volatile over the quarter on the back of global and local factors. The currency ended mixed, strengthening against the British pound (8%) and euro (2.7%) and weakening marginally against the US dollar (0.5%).

Funds with a larger exposure to local bonds and resources stocks outperformed during the quarter, while those which held significant exposures to financials and rand hedge stocks tended to struggle. Offshore funds also struggled during the quarter following mixed movements of the rand against developed market currencies, as well as muted offshore returns. Flexible income funds therefore led the gainers due to their large exposure to bonds.

The outcome of the Brexit vote adds additional uncertainty to an already volatile market. The full consequences remain unclear and markets will adjust accordingly as it becomes more certain. Following a diversified approach in this market remains the most appropriate way to manage risk. We therefore continue to hold a blend of managers with diversified styles with a preference for managers with a capital preservation mindset.
